KSL: 491272-HS2024-0-GS | Reading Course Global Studies

This reading seminar takes as its starting point the question: what is the global in our contemporary moment? Following the global turn in the humanities, this course reappraises established “global” frameworks and explores new and divergent concepts of the global. In light of new materialist, ecocritical, decolonial and horizontal critiques, the terms “global” appears more anthropocentric and Eurocentric than initially conceived.

If the global has come to be associated with neoliberal economic globalization, how can impulses of transnational and intercultural exchange, as well as local circumstances be reconsidered along planetary lines? This course will focus on key concepts, theories and emerging discourses. Participants will have an opportunity to select texts from different disciplines and sites of knowledge production.
